Exploring Miscommunication Through Interaction

Interactive Installation

Concept

Information exchanged between people is rarely conveyed with complete accuracy. When receiving a message, individuals often interpret, infer, and reconstruct its meaning from their own perspectives. As a result, what we believe to be understanding may simply be the outcome of filtering information and making compromises. The same applies to two-way discussions. Through debates and exchanges of opinions, information collides and evolves, but the conclusions reached are not always a complete consensus. Instead, they are often compromises formed between understanding and misunderstanding.

In everyday life, these misunderstandings are usually subtle and rarely cause serious problems, making the gaps in communication difficult to notice. Through this work, we hope to encourage participants to realize that people are prone to misinterpreting and speculating about others' intentions, and often mistake their own interpretations for genuine understanding.

Interaction Flow

01 Choose a Topic

Participants are free to decide what they want to talk about. From personal experiences and interests to everyday topics, any subject can become the starting point of a conversation.

02 Start Communicating

Participants communicate through microphones, transforming familiar forms of everyday messaging and voice communication into an interactive experience.

03 Information Distortion

Text becomes partially hidden and voices are blurred, reflecting the distortions that emerge from differences in memory, experience, and understanding.

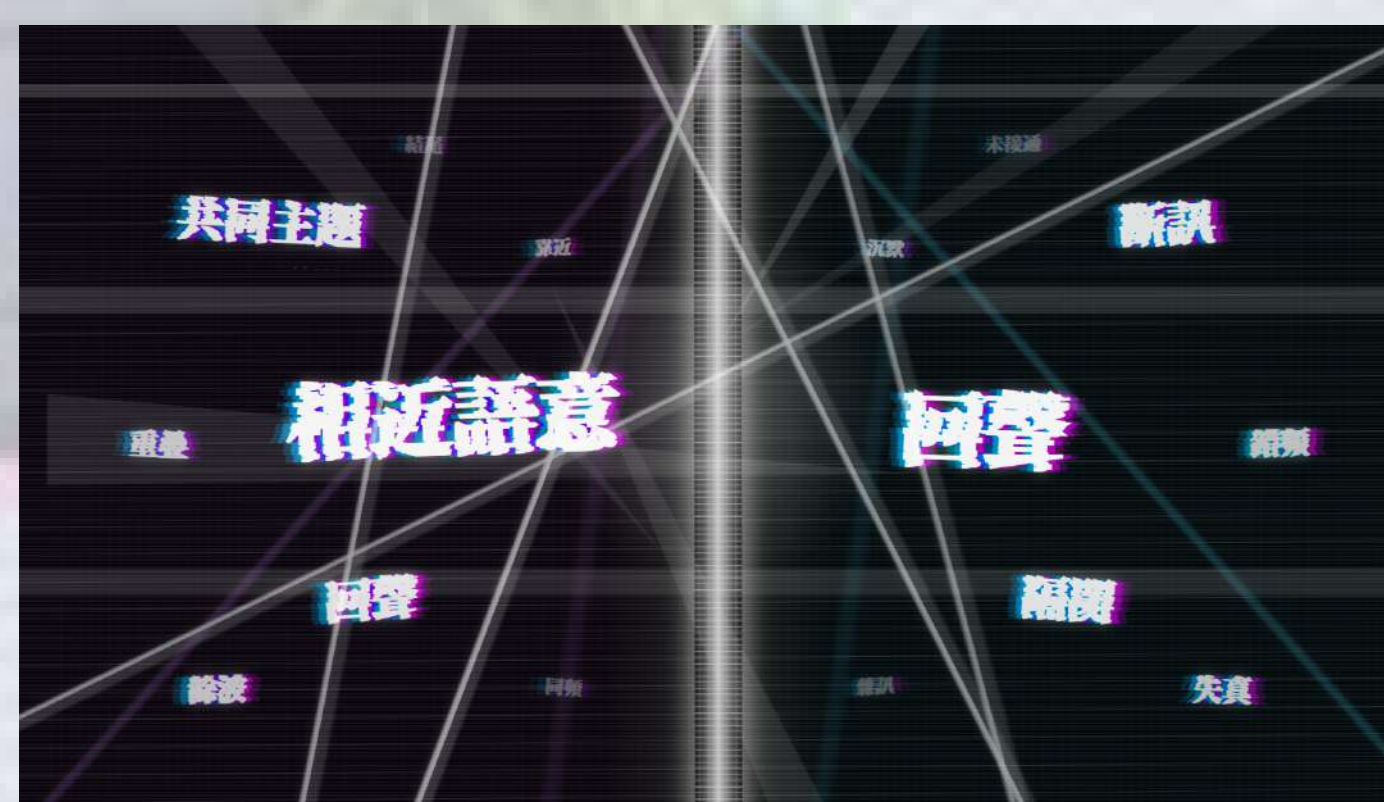

04 Building Understanding

As the meanings conveyed by both participants gradually align, the visuals become clearer and the noise in the audio fades. This symbolizes that understanding does not occur instantly, but is gradually formed through continuous communication.

Successful Communication —
Shared topics and keywords are displayed.

Result

Unsuccessful Communication —
The conversations are summarized separately, exposing the gaps in understanding through comparison.

Installation View

A curtain placed at the center of the installation physically separates the two participants, while microphones serve as their only means of communication. Restricted to exchanging information through text and voice, participants experience a mode of interaction that reflects contemporary forms of messaging and voice communication. Through the distortion and reconstruction of information, the work invites participants to reconsider the relationship between understanding and misunderstanding.

「Does communication really mean understanding?」
